

The strategy for critical thinking moonboys, welcome to the strategy of critical community trading.

Have you ever experienced FOMO, when your mind goes ooga booga, only to get slapped with a fat reality check, where the only thing that could make you calm would be to eat some crayons? Something new, on the likes of crypto, has penetrated the trading world, which is the phenomenon of people making commitments for the future of stocks together and discussing equities at online forums. To be a part of this type of trading can be very risky, because people always have their own intentions, long, short etc. There's also a risk that people promote pumps, spreading fud to make people believe in unrealistic goals. This is where the critical moonboy needs to step up his game. In the sea of ideas and commitments, critical thinking in terms of using tools and strategies to combat fud and false information is crucial to become a successful trader.

Let me give you an example. When people were doing stop the wall street v2 with GME and AMC, some people called out price manipulation when the percentage of buyers were around 90% and the rest sellers, while the price was decreasing. The only thing they forgot was that statistically, this had nothing to do with the volume of shares being sold vs being bought, only the amount of people buying/selling. So while dealing with both intelligent people and complete crayon eaters, the idea of fomo can rinse your account.

So how to deal with potential ideas from communities and moonboys, well let's do some research. Lets not forget that the idea of perfected trading does not exist, but at least you can sleep with a good conscience knowing that your gamble had some reasoning in it. Luckily, the lube from getting €€/€/(from (€((has an expiration date, unless you're stuck in one of p.diddy's dungeons.

- 1. Choose the industry and research for stocks that don't have two A's in it (brings bad luck, personal experience from irl chicks).
- 2. Join communities and get perspective from both selling + buying side. Understand the stock pattern by partially studying the moonboys mindset regarding both positive and negative days. Understand the price brackets and study deep resistances / floors.
- 3. Understand the institutional trading positioning, e.g % short position, q papers etc.
- 4. Dont get fooled by overstaying your visit. Selling isn't the ending destination, only a sign for a well deserved wank-sesh.
- 5. Dont over-analyze patterns, what has happened once rarely happens twice. If the selling-pressure outweighs the buying, and you cant short sell, then wank off a little and get a new perspective.
- 6. Use available tools to find important institutional data. Every stock has it's own positive catalysts. A pharma company might develop a new drug which needs to succeed in order for improved stock valuation, meanwhile a crypto-broker might need to hide the true valuation of customers acquired equities to stay relevant (pun intended).
- 7. To find catalysts, research the q1,2,3,4, of companies, fact-check moon-boys ideas and with time, you might become an idea-generating moon-boy yourself! Insider info is also quite handy.
- 8. Stay frosty out there, this is a text put together in easy words, which might come in handy while lost in the sea. Read people through the screen and correlate it with the stock movement. And remember, if you stand for anything you stand for nothing, watch which crew ya fuck with at the moment (sell / buy). Be the biggest snitch on gangnam.